INFORMATION POSTED WITH REVENGE PORN

In addition to explicit images, perpetrators post other identifying information to revenge porn sites, resulting in harassment of victims.

DATES THE RISE OF 'REVENGE PORN'

My ex-boyfriend posted sexual pictures of me on the internet but police said they could do nothing. How is it not illegal?

30m pages viewed per month at height of revenge porn site

Campaner: Revenge porn victim Holly got states to bring in laws.

Suicide 'good' says sick website creator

REVENGE porn hit the web in 2010 when 28-year-old American Hunter Moore set up a website called isAnyones.com which invited visitors to submit sex shots of people they knew. At its height it had 30 million page views a month. Now under investigation by the FBI for security breaches and identity theft, Moore remains unrepentant about the damage his site - and its later copycats - has caused to victims.

He once bragged that coverage of a suicide would lead to more hits on his website. "Do you know how much money I'd make?" he said.

Florida-born Holly Jacobs has spent seven years campaigning to change the law in America after accusing ex-boyfriend Ryan Seery of posting explicit pictures of her and emailing the links to friends and colleagues.

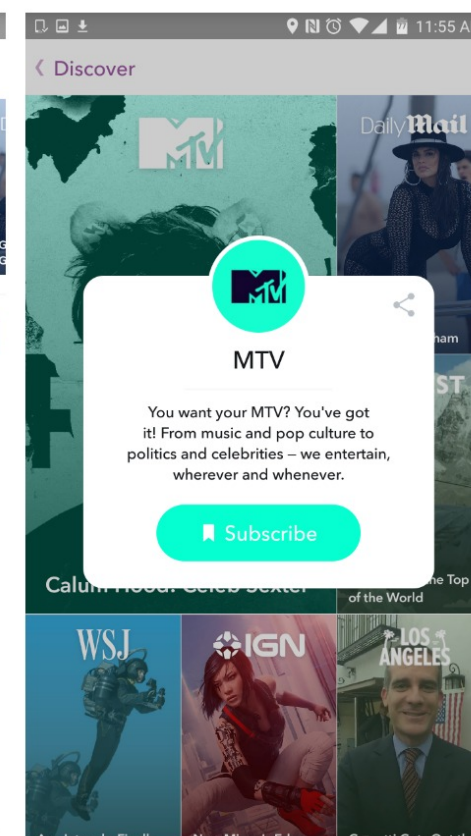

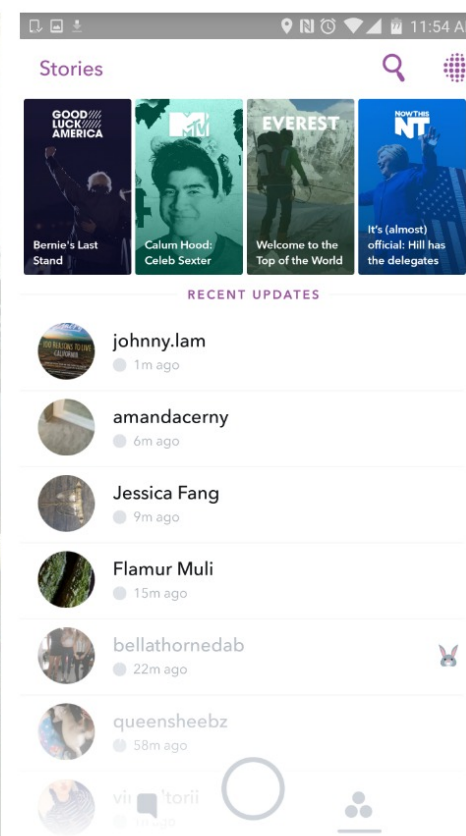

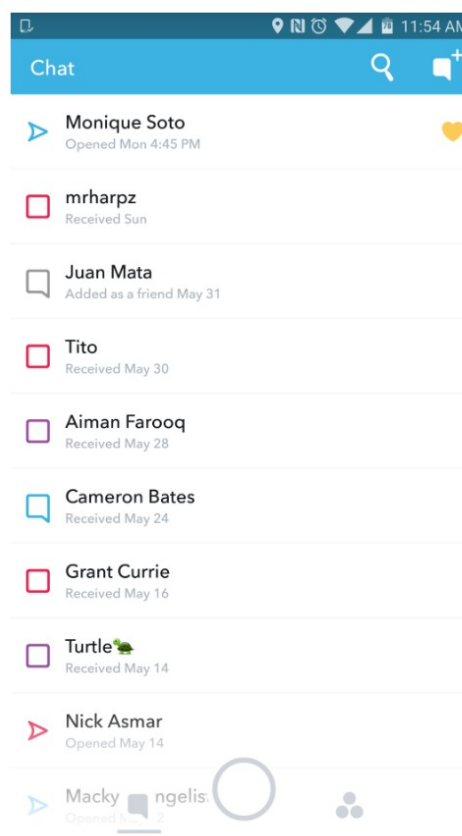

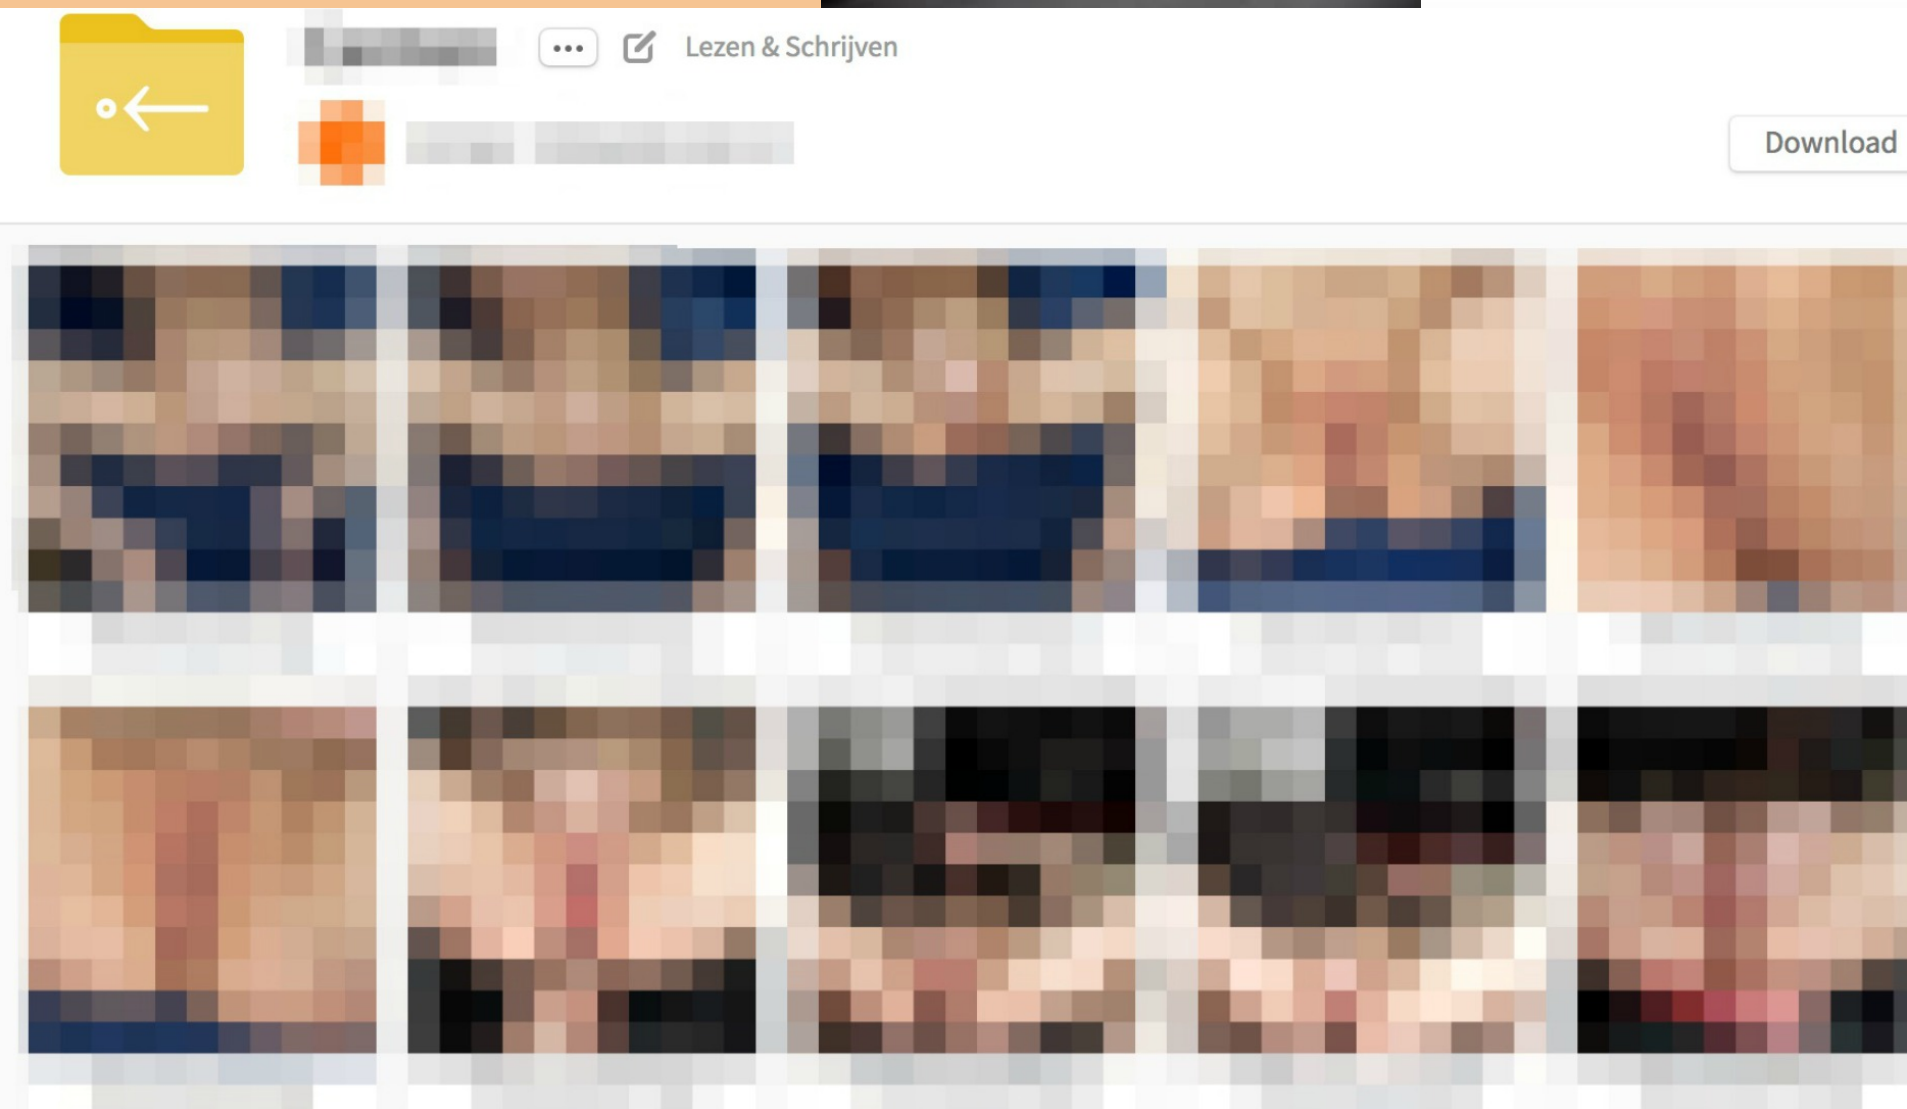

The pictures appeared on several revenge porn sites including AmNotOrNotUp.com and DocuShare.com and DoxxedMe, alongside her full name and a screen grab of her Facebook page.

FROZE

Holly was working at a university in Miami when she first discovered the pictures had been uploaded. She said: "It completely froze me. My stomach dropped and I felt like all the blood had rushed out of me." She confronted her ex who denied he'd shared the images.

In August 2012, she discovered the details, time and address of a conference she was due to speak at had been published alongside her naked photos. She says: "One comment said 'why don't you go check her out and see if she'll have sex with you for money?' Suddenly I realised what danger I could be in." Holly was forced to change jobs, legally change her name, deactivate all of her social media accounts and move house.

But despite all this, she could not find a way to prosecute her ex, who denies the claims. She set up the Cyber Civil Rights Initiative and launched the End Revenge Porn campaign to try to change the law to allow victims to press charges. To date Arizona, Idaho, California, Utah, Georgia, Virginia, Wisconsin, Colorado, Hawaii, Maryland and New Jersey all have anti-revenge porn laws. Ironically her own state, Florida, has yet to do so. "I hope by speaking out it's set an example," says Holly.
